EATING DIRT SAID

CLAY IS CURE FOR CHOLERA, AC-CORDING TO MEDICAL DISCOVERY,

Dry Powder Held To Have Healing Effect on Membranes.

Eating dirt-a prescription long disesteemed by an ignorant and prejudiced public-has at last secured the beginning of due recognition as a medical measure of high virtue and validity. The new medical doctrine of bolus alba (which may be translated into kaolin, fuller's earth, hydrous silicate of alumina, or the more rigidly scientific H4 A12 Si2 O2) comes to us simultaneously from Chicago and from the Teutonic allied military doctors on the Galician battle front, and therefore may not be lightly put aside. In truth, the veracious reports from many sources compel a surprising revision of our customary notions in regard to a number of things. On the battle front in eastern Europe it appears that the Teutonic doctors have successfully combatted the dreaded cholera and the dysentary patients with porcelain clay, so that the cheapest conscript among them all has stood up to the Russian hordes as stanchly as a taffeta petticoat on a Boston bargain counter. Rumors that the Austrian troops lacked "sand" are thus seen to be technical distortions of the truth, for it is evident that the popular conception of sand, in a military sense, has been mistaken. We have been miseducated by Kipling's stories of the English subaltern in India to the idea that the military virtues of pipeclay resided in the application of that substance of puttees. Ah, those blundering Britishers! If they had put their pipeclay inside, what might they not have accomplished against the plagues of their eastern empire! Sand, indeed! When history seems to be on the point of recording that the Dukia Pass was successfully barricaded with Austrian porcelainunbaked! There is much in this matter that deserves our serious attention and examination. Before we touch upon details, let it be stated summarily that Kaolin, or fuller's earth, clears the human body of many kinds of microbic intruders; clears the throat of the dangerous diphtheria carrier; is an antidote in morphia, ipecae and sthryenia poisoning, and makes the bitter quinine sweet to the childish palate. The detailed items of the catalogue are now in order for closer inspection.

In spite of its more or less hamorous associations, the use of kaolin (porcelain clay) or fuller's earth as a medicament for human patients seems to have a very solid, if somewhat obscure, scientific foundation. Fuller's earth was formerly much used for taking the grease out of woolen cloth, during the manufacture. It is sold by the drug stores of today under various names, such as "precipitated French chalk," and is used by housewives and others for soaking up grease spots from inappropriate places. The material is a fine white, or whitish clay, not much sticky or plastic. Its very minute, irregular shaped particles have a remarkably absorptive power and it is this quality which gives the substance its efficiency against at least some of the bacterial invaders of the human body. Very specific and striking testimony to its efficacy is presented in an article just published by Drs. Hektoen and Rapaport of Chicago, who give the results of their use of it against diphtheria and scarlet fever at the Durand hospital in Chicago. They use the name "koalin" for their material.

"Kaolin in a dry powder," say the Chicago doctors, "removes not only diphtheria bacilli, but also practically all bacilli from the nose in the course of three or four days." A bad diphtheria throat has been completely cleared of bacilli by the same agency in two or three days. The nose "cold" of scarlet fever is stopped by kaolin, and examination has shown that the miscellaneously dangerous streptococus (familiar to Boston in deadly milk horne epidemics of sore throat) is one of the organisms for which the particles of kaolin have a potent affinity.

In treating the nasal membrances with kaolin, the dry powder is blown into the nasal passages ("insufflated") by means of a rubber bulb and a glass tube. The process is carried out at two-hour intervals (in the Chicago practice), the powdered kaolin being dusted in six or seven times at each application. The particles absorb the moisture on the surfaces of the lining membranes, and with the moisture all the microbes living therein with which the particles come in contact. Although the powdered kaolin has a chalky, dry, taste upon the tongue, its use in the nasal passages is reported to be wholly nonirritating. For clearing the throat of microbes the powdered kaolin is swallowed slowly in one-third of a teaspoonful doses four or five times an hour during the day. This probably is not an affirmatively agreeable treatment; but those who have spent perhaps a week after being sick with diphtheris trying to get a clean throat by gargling with corrosive sublime solu tion (it is done) may count the clay cure not so bad after all.

Even if corporations had souls probably they couldn't get fire insurance on them
